“Architecture is a humane social practice that provides the gift of connection.”

— Marlon Blackwell

We often measure the places we inhabit by their scale, their grandeur, or the permanence of their stone and steel. Yet, history reminds us that the true measure of any structure lies in something far quieter: its capacity to embrace the human spirit. A building is not merely a shelter from the elements; at its best, it is a backdrop to human life, a stage where memories unfold, and a gentle facilitator of shared experience.

When the celebrated master Charles Correa spoke of placing the individual at the centre of their environment, he was advocating for an architecture of empathy. He understood that when we build with respect for climate, landscape, and local context, we are not just designing walls — we are nurturing a sense of belonging.

This fundamental idea echoed strongly during the 9th Charles Correa Memorial Lecture recently, when AIA Gold Medalist Marlon Blackwell reminded us that our built world is ultimately tested by how thoughtfully it cares for the young, the elderly, and the collective well-being of a society. The spaces that truly endure are always those built with sensitivity, context, and heart.

As we look across the work we do, let us remember that the structures we shape today will, in turn, shape the lives of tomorrow. Beyond form and function, our enduring responsibility remains simple yet profound — to build with purpose, to respect context, and to offer the quiet gift of human connection.

CHARLES CORREA MEMORIAL LECTURE

9TH EDITION

A celebration of architecture rooted in empathy, context and people.

Marlon Blackwell with Harshavardhan Neotia

Designing with Empathy

Every year, Kolkata's design fraternity gathers to revisit a fundamental question: How do the spaces we build serve the lives they house?

In an era of rapid urbanisation, the 9th edition of the Annual Charles Correa Memorial Lecture – hosted by the Ambuja Neotia Group in partnership with The Charles Correa Foundation at City Centre Salt Lake – offered a timely pause.

The event brought together architects, urban planners, scholars, and students to reflect on the enduring philosophy of Charles Correa: that thoughtful architecture must place the individual at the centre of its environment, harmonising climate, culture, and context.

Harshavardhan Neotia

A Shared Commitment to Context and People

The memorial lecture series has grown into an important national platform for dialogues on humane urbanism – a vision that closely mirrors the core ethos of the Ambuja Neotia Group. Opening the evening, Harshavardhan Neotia, Chairman, Ambuja Neotia Group, highlighted Correa's lasting impact on modern Indian architecture: "Charles Correa was not merely an architect; he was a visionary who transformed the way we think about space, culture, and community. His work demonstrated that architecture can be deeply contemporary while remaining rooted in its context and people. Through this lecture series, we seek to keep that spirit alive by creating a platform where ideas can inspire future generations of architects, designers, and city-makers."

Charles Correa (1930 – 2015)

Marlon Blackwell on Architecture as a Humane Social Practice

Inauguration of 9th Charles Correa Memorial Lecture at City Centre Salt Lake

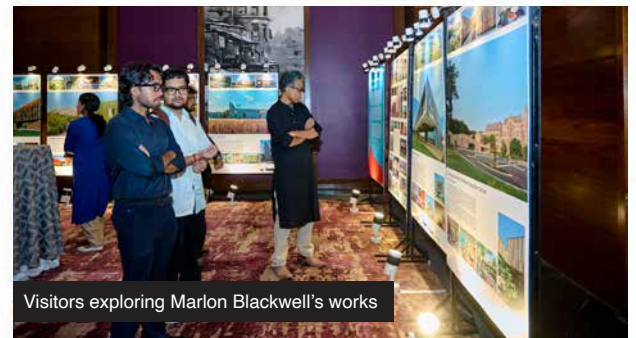

This year's keynote address was delivered by Marlon Blackwell, AIA Gold Medalist and Distinguished Professor at the University of Arkansas. Known globally for designs that respond intimately to topography, material culture, and regional identity, Blackwell echoed Correa's core principle—that meaningful design ultimately belongs to the community that inhabits it.

During his presentation, Blackwell shared a diverse portfolio of public spaces, educational institutions, and civic projects. Highlighting landmark works such as Shelby Farms Park in Memphis, he illustrated how thoughtful design can transform complex landscapes into inclusive spaces for public life.

“Charles Correa understood something many architects spend a lifetime pursuing — that the most meaningful buildings belong to the people who inhabit them. To speak in his memory, in a city that celebrates his legacy, is both an honour and a privilege.”

– Marlon Blackwell

Reflecting on the broader purpose of the built environment, Blackwell remarked, “How should we assess a society? Perhaps best by a society's care for its children, for its elderly, for the less advantaged, by its equitable provision for a full quality of life to all... Architecture is a humane social practice that provides the gift of connections.”

Sustaining a Legacy of Thoughtful Urbanism

Anchored by architect Ashish Acharjee, the evening reinforced the idea that architecture is far more than physical structure; it is a vital catalyst for social cohesion, environmental responsibility, and civic identity.

By bringing international perspectives like Blackwell's to Kolkata, the Charles Correa Memorial Lecture continues to nurture a reflective design culture — one that honours legacy while actively shaping a more empathetic and sustainable built environment for the future.

International Day of Yoga Celebration at Anantabadal Playground

As part of its ongoing commitment to community welfare and holistic development, the Corporate CSR team celebrated the International Day of Yoga by organising a dedicated wellness workshop for children at Anantabadal Playground. Situated midway between our Utpalaa the Condoville and Park Unizen project sites, the venue provided an accessible space for local families and young residents from surrounding neighbourhoods to come together.

The morning event drew enthusiastic participation from 50 children, who were introduced to the fundamentals of physical and mental well-being under the expert guidance of trained instructors. The structured session covered a series of foundational asanas (yoga postures), gentle stretching exercises, and simple pranayama (breathing techniques) tailored specifically to improve focus, posture, and flexibility in growing children. Beyond the physical demonstrations, instructors highlighted the role of daily mindfulness in reducing stress, encouraging emotional balance, and fostering healthy, active lifestyle habits from a young age.

Organised in collaboration with local community stakeholders and neighbourhood residents, the programme served as a meaningful platform for empowering local youth with tools for lifelong physical and mental wellness.

Strong Communities. Healthy Futures.
Together, we grow stronger.
